BOTTLE FEEDING AND TOOTH DECAY

Have you ever wondered why so many children who have been bottle-fed for longer than one year have upper teeth decayed to the gum

Many times the cause of tooth decay in these children may be the bedtime or naptime bottle of milk, juice, or other sugar containing liquid.

When a child is awake and hungrily sucking from a bottle, he has a good flow of saliva and swallows frequently. However, when he gets drowsy and falls asleep, he sucks with less force, makes less saliva and doesn't swallow as often. Because the tongue is on the nipple, it keeps the food from the lower teeth; but the upper part of the mouth is bathed in the sugar containing liquid.

The surface of everyone's teeth contains acid forming bacteria. The bacteria feed on sugar and starch and begin making acid within a few minutes after food is in the mouth. As the food puddle stays in the mouth of a sleeping child, the teeth are exposed to acid for long periods of time. The acid slowly dissolves the surface of the enamel. Once the hard enamel layer of tooth is destroyed, decay spreads rapidly through the softer dentin layer.

A child's fussiness or picky eating may be due to pain from his decayed teeth. It is important that children keep their first or primary teeth because they are needed for chewing, for speech, for appearance, and to keep the shape of the jaws so that the permanent teeth will grow in the proper position.

GREAT SCOT!
By Jack House, The Director Teacher's Scottish Information Center

A Point About A Pint

Odd question: If you walked a Scots mile, why would you be glad of a Scots pint?

Answer: The old Scottish mile (1,984 yards) was longer than the British mile (1,760 yards), and the old Scottish pint of beer, wine or whisky was much bigger than the British measure. In fact, the Scots joint was the equivalent of about three pints imperial measure. So the old Scots song, "Gae bring to me a pint o' wine," meant that the equivalent of two bottles would be supplied.

Nowadays the measurements are the same over the whole of the United Kingdom, but the Scots are still inclined to think of bigger things. Whisky is served in larger measures in Scotland than it is in England. Teacher's Scotch Information Centre is delighted to tell you, There is no difference in the quality, but there is a decided difference in the quantity.
